Interview summary
Boys Ranch – Client #1 – They are 16 years old and have been here for one year. They came from detention. They like it here and appreciates the opportunity to focus on what each resident needs to do. They get along with staff. The food is not luxury, but they get enough to eat. They get snacks, and water is always available. They have gone on home visits. They have the opportunity to make phone calls to family every day. They feel safe here, and no one has put their hands on them. If they could change anything about the program, it would be that staff communicate with each other more, and there is more consistency with staff. Client # 2 – They are 18 years old and have been here for four months. They were previously at J5. The boy's ranch is similar to J5, but they feel like there is more freedom at the ranch. They feel like it was a good transition going from J5 to the ranch. They feel safe here. The staff are cool, though they can be nitpicky. They get along with the other residents, though some are mean. Staff intervene when residents are mean. The food is amazing; they work in the kitchen. The food is authentic. No one has put their hands on them. They have visits on Saturdays and phone calls every day. J5 – Client # 1 – They are 15 years old and been here for one and a half months. They were previously in the program but was sent to detention for two months for not engaging. They feel like they can learn what they need to do, and they know they need to be here. They expect to be here for 60-90 days and then go to a residential program, such as the boys Boy's Ranch. They feel safe here, and no one has put their hands on them. The food is pretty good; last night they had chicken parmesan for dinner. They get along with the other clients. Staff do their job. They get phone calls to family four times a week. Six hour offsite visits can be earned, but they have not had any offsite visits yet. They don't like that when one resident is acting out, it affects everyone else.

Boys Ranch – The program currently has a total of 28 residents. The program was very clean and in good repair. The campus has a new greenhouse, which was sponsored by the local Rotary club. The program will be building a pole shed for storage for the vocational program. The program has started getting the grounds ready for the annual horse show this summer. J5 – The program currently has 11 residents. The program was very clean and in good repair. Residents were in school. The second pod is currently empty as the program doesn't have the staff to open the pod. The program focuses on restorative justice. Safety, security, supervision and structure are the key points in the program. The program receives meals from the Boy's Ranch.
